From passive resistance to armed struggle

Ama and Roy’s five children – Shanthie, Indres, Murthie, Ramnie and Prema – all joined the liberation movement, suffering persecution, detention, solitary confinement and torture.

The Sharpeville Massacre on 21 March 1960 marked the end of peaceful resistance to apartheid. Soon after, the ANC and PAC were banned and forced underground.

Just over fifty years had passed since the first satyagraha campaigns. In 1961, after much deliberation, the ANC took a decision to resort to armed struggle. This led to the formation of uMkhonto we Sizwe (MK), the ANC’s military wing. The initial phase of armed struggle emphasised sabotage that would not involve loss of life.

“My family had always believed in a peaceful resolution to our struggle in this country. But in 1961 I decided to take up arms against the regime. It was necessary. It was our form of struggle to bring about peace.” Indres Naidoo, TRC hearing

The people’s patience is not endless. The time comes in the life of any nation when there remain only two choices – submit or fight.”

1961 MK Manifesto

The scene of the blast at New Canada Station, Langlaagte carried out by Indres, Shirish Nanabhai and Reggie Vandeyar’s MK unit. Photo: The Star

Indres Naidoo was one of MK’s early recruits. The grandson of the founding father of the satyagraha movement had also run out of patience. On 17 April 1963, he was caught with Reggie Vandeyar and Shirish Nanabhai as they were blowing up a railway signal box in the veld just outside Johannesburg. Indres was shot, and taken bleeding to Red Eye Street. The three men were detained, severely tortured and sentenced to ten years’ imprisonment on Robben Island.

“My family had always believed in a peaceful resolution to our struggle in this country. But in 1961 I decided to take up arms against the regime. It was necessary. It was our form of struggle to bring about peace.” Indres Naidoo, TRC hearing
We shall overcome

“We shall overcome”

The satyagraha notion of ‘truth force’ was deeply ingrained in Thambi Naidoo’s descendants. In 1969, Ama and Roy’s eldest daughter, Shanthie, was detained without charge under the Terrorism Act. She was held in solitary confinement and tortured for refusing to testify against her friends and comrades, Winnie Mandela and Joyce Sikhakhane. She told the judge that she would not be able to live with her conscience if she did testify.

After 371 days in prison, most of it in solitary confinement, Shanthie was released. Despite the extreme trauma she had to endure, she remained faithful to the liberation movement – and true to herself.

In September 1972, Shanthie was finally given permission by the apartheid government to leave South Africa on an exit permit. A big crowd went to the airport to bid her farewell, and sang “We shall overcome”.

Shanthie worked at the International Defence and Aid Fund (IDAF) in London and later at the ANC’s Solomon Mahlangu Freedom College (SOMAFCO) in Mazimbu, Tanzania.

“I was forced to stand for five days and nights, while they fired questions at me. I lost all sense of time. I began to lose hold on reality. I had terrifying hallucinations, like nightmares, in which the questions became mixed up with broken dreams.”

Shanthie Naidoo

After 671 days in prison, most of it in solitary confinement, Shanthie was released. Despite the extreme trauma she had to endure, she remained faithful to the liberation movement – and true to herself.

In September 1972, Shanthie was finally given permission by the apartheid government to leave South Africa on an exit permit. A big crowd went to the airport to bid her farewell, and sang “We shall overcome”.

Shanthie worked at the International Defence and Aid Fund (IDAF) in London and later at the ANC’s Solomon Mahlangu Freedom College (SOMAFCO) in Mazimbu, Tanzania.
Between 1960 and 1990, when the ANC, PAC and SACP were banned, thousands of South Africans left the country to escape persecution, receive military and political training, and continue the activities of the ANC in exile. Ramnie was the first of Ama and Roy’s children to leave South Africa. Her husband, Issy Dinat, an underground activist for the banned SACP, had been detained in 1966 and called to give evidence at the trial of Bram Fischer. Issy spent four months in detention and escaped from South Africa soon after his release.

In February 1967 Ramnie decided to leave South Africa with her two small children, Natalya and Sean, to join Issy in London, but their passports were withdrawn two days before they were due to depart. They hastily applied for exit permits, which were granted – but it meant that they were unable to return to South Africa.

In London, the Dinats immersed themselves in political activity. They frequently participated in marches and demonstrations. Gender campaigns against apartheid were many international issues on the agenda in the 1960s, such as the Vietnam war. Natalya said this.

“I remember sitting in the bathtub in a damp Finchley flat, watching Ramnie reading a letter from Ama about Shanthie’s arrest, and weeping. I was about five years old and I didn’t know what to do.” Natalya Dinat

“Exile is a dream of a glorious return. It is an endless paradox: looking forward by always looking back.” Salman Rushdie
Mobilising people

Released from Robben Island in 1973, Indres left South Africa in 1977 to work for the ANC in Mozambique, and later in the German Democratic Republic (East Germany). Now Ama only had Murthie and Prema in the country — and their political actions, much of it underground, meant that family life was still severely disrupted, and under constant threat.

Internal resistance to apartheid was rapidly increasing. Unions, civic organisations, and students were becoming more militant. Many Naidoo and Pillay family members got involved in civil society structures and non-government organisations, a number of which were banned, risking arrest and detention.

“We were under constant surveillance. We used to be raided regularly, at least once a month. We never kept banned literature at home. We used to be very careful, also when we talked over the telephone.” Prema Naidoo

In 1980 Murthie helped set up a support group for Laudium schools participating in a national education boycott. He was arrested and spent two weeks in solitary confinement, then six months in Witsberen Prisons.

Murthie and Prema were involved in setting up civic associations in Lenasia, Alexandra and Laudium, and a support committee for political prisoners. They also mobilised against the South African Indian Council (SAIC), an apartheid structure ostensibly representing Indians.

In Pretoria, the heart of the apartheid state, Mrs Pillay’s children were active in civic, sports and youth organisations. Gonoseelan was one of the pioneers of non-racial sport and became well-known as a brilliant soccer player and administrator for his club, Delft’s F.C and the Pretoria District Football Association. Gonoseelan was also closely associated with MK.

“In Lenz we organised a very successful bus boycott. We worked among the poor working class around housing and pensions. It was at that level that we could mobilise people.” Murthie Naidoo
“There is no despair. The time is not far away when we will all be back together as one family. I believe I will live to see that day.” Ama Naidoo, on Prema’s incarceration

“The UDF was like Rocky Street. A home for all kinds of people.”

Murthie Naidoo

“Prema was detained on 27 November 1981 and interrogated for six days and nights continuously about his role in harbouring an escaped political prisoner, Stephen Lee. He spent more than a year in prison.

“For most of my life Johannesburg was a place of discrimination, misery, and terror. Since 1995 this Council has transformed the City. Before Council, I was a welder with very little formal education. Allow me to express my deepest gratitude to the ANC and this Council for having the faith, trust and confidence in making a welder a public servant.”

Prema Naidoo’s retirement speech, 2016
Born into struggle

The 1980s saw the coming of age of many of Thambi Naidoo’s great-grandchildren, a generation born in the turbulent, repressive 1960s and 1970s, and delivered into activism.

Ramnie’s children, Natalya and Sean, grew up in the heart of the South African exile community in London. They were young Londoners, caught up in the trends of the time, but ultimately they chose to serve the liberation struggle and were both deployed into ANC structures.

Natalya spent six months at Solomon Mahlangu Freedom College (SOMAFCO) in Tanzania before she was sent to Moscow to study medicine. She witnessed first hand the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1989, acutely aware of the impact on the die-hard Communists in her family.

“At the age of 19, Sean volunteered to teach English at SOMAFCO and from there went for military training in the MK camps in Angola in 1984. The experience was brutal, especially seeing live combat.”

“I was a brat with a north London accent. I cried every day. But I wanted to be there because I was driven by a terrible anger at the South African regime, at apartheid, at what they had done to my family. Bizarrely, today I look back to the camps with fond memories. Because I belonged to something.”

Sean Dinat

“The fall of the Soviet Union completely pulled the rug out from under people’s feet. Like many people, Indres didn’t know what to make of it. He had given up everything for this ideology. His world had changed.” Natalya Dinat

Back in South Africa, Sean was deployed into the newly integrated South African National Defence Force in 1994.

Back in South Africa, Sean was deployed into the newly integrated South African National Defence Force in 1994.
The next generation took up the baton. Kuben, Prema’s son, (holding a placard as a young boy on the title panel) was arrested for organising a student demonstration during his matric year and had to write some of his final exams in jail. Today he is a deputy governor of the Reserve Bank.

Cousins Thava and Nava Pillay, Mrs Pillay’s grandchildren, were part of the ANC underground in Pretoria and active in the mass mobilisation movement of the late 1980s. Their MK cells were named Thambi Naidoo and Roy Naidoo, respectively.

Other Pillay grandchildren were involved in local anti-apartheid structures, like the Laudium Inter-Primary Sports Association and the Laudium Youth Congress. Thushan, Thillay, Parmesh, Vinesh, and Thava were all detained and interrogated. Thillay was severely beaten at a mass protest shortly before his final exams.

Mass protests and increased international pressure marked the death knell of apartheid. In February 1990, the ANC and other organisations were unbanned, and Nelson Mandela walked free. The ANC came into power in April 1994. Now a young generation of Naidoo and Pillay activists had to make a significant shift from being part of a resistance movement to dedicating themselves to building a democratic, inclusive nation.

Many family members moved into civil service positions. Others chose to work in non-governmental and community sports organisations. Mrs Pillay’s granddaughter, Subethri, Murthie’s daughter, Zoya, and Prema’s son, Duggy, became teachers, driven by a desire to have a positive influence on young lives in uncertain times.

“Our family has always been driven by the ideals of non-racialism, non-sexism, justice and democracy, and the upliftment of the poor and downtrodden. These are the ideals for which we have fought, and which we will always serve.”

Nava Pillay

“The one thing that it was never about was power or money. No one in the family grew up thinking that it was important to be rich.” Subethri Naidoo
The family was reunited after the ANC was unbanned in 1990. Shanthie, Indres and Ramnie returned to South Africa in 1991, and for the first time since 1963, Ama had all her children with her. Natalya, Sean and Bram, Indres’s son, returned while Djanine, Indres’s daughter, remained in Mozambique.

“Ama died peacefully on Christmas Day 1993 at the age of eighty-six. Her fervent wish was to see freedom in South Africa and to vote in the first democratic election. She saw freedom, but died a few months before she could vote.” Indres Naidoo

It’s just over 125 years since Thambi Naidoo arrived in Port Elizabeth, dreaming of a new beginning. His great great grandchildren are coming of age in a very different South Africa – a country fundamentally shaped by patriots like Thambi and Veerammal and their descendants. But while there have been decisive victories in the struggle for freedom, there is much more to be done.

“It is our concern that there is a move away from the principles and values enshrined in the Freedom Charter. We did not sacrifice so much to enrich the few. Our vision is a sustainable future for all our people.” Letter from the Naidoo and Dadoo families to the ANC, April 2016

The young Naidoos and Pillays have in their DNA those qualities that will help them navigate the complexity of their world today: a willingness to be of service to community and country, and a deep commitment to social justice. They have resistance in their blood.

“Ama was proud to be part of the Naidoo family, a family which has played an important role in shaping South Africa’s history. My family has fought for human rights for generations. I have learnt that selflessness pays off, and I hope to live up to the noble example that the Naidoo and Pillay families have set.” Leilah Grange, 16 – Sean’s daughter
CREDITS

Produced by the Apartheid Museum with sponsorship from the Foundation for Human Rights

Director – Christopher Till
Curator – Emilia Potenza
Historical advisors – Luli Callinicos, Prinisha Badassy and Arianna Lissoni
Scriptwriter – Bea Roberts
Picture research – Ruth Muller and Jacqui Masiza
Film production – Guy Spiller
Artefacts – Adrienne van den Heever
Graphic design – Megan Visagé
Production – Scan Shop

Special thanks to:

• the many members of the Naidoo and Pillay families for assisting with research and artefacts selection
• the Liliesleaf Trust for access to the Naidoo Family Collection
• members of the Wits History Workshop for their support
• the Ahmed Kathrada and Nelson Mandela Foundations for their support
• Ilse Wilson for being a champion of this project